That's really great! I was thinking about it too, but I also wanted to allow a user to drag any directory to the shortcut panel. Such links should be stored "somewhere". By somewhere I mean application "*.cfg" file or maybe better some global system storage. In vista there is such a storage located at c:\users\user_name\links, where system just creates file links. Probably GNOME and KDE has similar places. The only problem is XP and 9X. In this case shortcut list should be placed somewhere in the registry. If you could also add simple list instead of icons in shortcut panel that would be really cool.
