Yes I thought about that more than once but it will still force to static color images initialized when skin is changed, what if user wants to change palette?

You just regenerate images.

Yes, that's what I thought then, I think it will be a bit more complicated but I'll make some tests and see what's best..

BTW, not quite related and not very helpful in this case, but one of my recent ideas is that palette (generally, not in this case only) can be quite effectively implemented using Image too. With the advantage that you can use color selector in .iml editor..

(Not used for anything so far, just an idea).
