- I think uvs2 is bad idea, because it is non-standard, and works only on limited bandwidth for limited number of people. So I think the migration to different development model would be a step forward.

But it's up to Mirek to decide which direction that forward should take. SVN? GIT? Mercurial? Bazaar (versioning system)?

Plenty of choices, each does promise a bit different future, and require quite different policies and rules.

Well, that is the problem. I accept that uvs2 is no longer a good solution, but right now the migration effort does not seem worth it, especially when the options are many and none perfect... I am afraid of going from one unoptimal solution to another. At least, with uvs2, I know what to expect. And from time to time, we can fix problems too
