 if the Makefiles were generated every night (or preferably as part of every commit), then me generating a live ebuild would be a snap.

I still think we are not communicating clearly on the X11/umk thing, but I think I see where you are going at this point. umk will lot be usable for boot strapping, and theIde has to already be up and running to process the makefiles.

One other thing... You do not have to worry about makeing u++ great because it already is. It's just making it better

Thanks,
