When the IDE starts I would like to edit the last active project, like every other editor or IDE I have ever used does - or at least, this is what I think it should do by default because newcomers won't know how to use the "select package" dialog.

I agree with the rest, but I repeat that last the project is preselected. Which IMO is much more sensible behaviour.

And I repeat that it's disconcerting to newbies and I suspect is easy to make optional

Well, I guess first thing newbie should do is to try examples.

First run he will be presented with all examples. Next run he will be stuck with the example he selected in previous run. What is more confusing?

It is definitely easy to do this optional, the question is what would be the default..
