I also don't see much point on having dialogs/controls in XML, or, weel, just a possible point, the dialog testing phase, on which you can "look" at dialogs without using them.

May be somehow useful, indeed, but it's also easy to write few upp code lines and show the same dialog using upp.

Another possible use would be to make dialogs with another app (which ???) and then export them to upp.... but then you'll have to connect dialogs to code anyways.

I'd see more useful some tool to convert dialogs from other toolkits to Upp. That would spare some porting time.

Ciao
