That's the whole idea about linux deveopment, most of you advanced developers prefer the "hard" way. But we "business" developers prefer the easy way to do the "easy" things and then focus on business requirements.

I understand you, but everytime I had to create something in tool like powerbuilder where you can make an app using mouse only the troubles appeared when something uncommon had to be done. Then I had to make ugly workarounds. I just hate them. I prefer few more lines of code but to have a control.

Besides coding in upp is very easy IMO. I would call it "soft code way"

BTW, the Ultimate++ library really started as replacement for Oracle Forms (which is similar "clicking" environment as PowerBuilder, perhaps more even more clicking and more limitations
