On files longer than a few lines it gets really scroll intensive at times

TheIDE really needs collapsible code blocks more (IMHO) than the commenting box.

I find myself clicking this box every now and then, just because that's where all other Editors of my choice (Notepad++; MS Visual C++ to name just two) have that code collapse icon ([+] [-])

just saying

Hello,

Code folding has got long term tradition in u++ framework. Many wants to see it. Currently, nobody finished it - so the feature will need to wait for better times. I agree that it is needed, but with current .cpp/.h, navigator and good code design it is not critical for us to survive. Of course, if somebody delivers such solution for TheIDE we can easily integrated it with our main line source code base.

So, if you have tones of time to do that, you are welcome ;) But, firstly you need to learn basics - Am I right?

Sincerely,
Klugier

:lol: Yepp you are perfectly correct.. I need to refresh some of what little I've known in the past and more importantly try to keep up with all the changes since MS VC++ 2008 ;)
and the difference in "flavour" of upp.

So I will not be much of a help in the near future.

but so far I like the upp concept;
within the ~2k lines of code (incl layout and database schemes)
I cannot but applaud to some of the convenient shortcuts that are possible for me to take with it.
The question is.. can I accept the drawbacks or better.. how many can I accept shrugs
IDK yet.. haven't spend nearly enough time with it to decide just yet.

Anyways, as long as I know it's still on the ToDo List somewhere I'm happy enough for now.

Since for me personally the thing is, with only 2k lines so far I find myself using notepad++ for editing the files more often than not and switching back to TheIDE only to conveniently compile the alterations.

Alright, it's on the list and that's okay for now..
If by accident I stumble across the easy [&] solution (;)) I'll let you guys know.
